NINE SCENTS

A house does not smell of one thing all day.

Most fragrance is sold as a mood. We think that is the wrong unit. A kitchen at eight in the morning and a dining room at ten at night are different rooms in different weather, and they want different air.

So the range is organised the way a house actually works — by room, and by hour. Nine scents, blended in small batches in Somerset, in quantities small enough that we know which vat each one came out of.

THE HOUSE

Ninety litres, rested.

An account of how the range is actually made, what goes into it, and the parts we have not managed to fix.

2014

It started as a complaint

The house began because nothing on the shelf smelled like the rooms it was supposed to be in. Everything was a mood — "calm", "escape", "cosy" — and nothing was a place. Scents were sold the way perfume is sold, as an idea about the person buying it.

We started blending for rooms instead. A bathroom is cold, hard and full of moving air; a bedroom is soft and still. Those are different acoustic problems, and they need different answers. It turned out to be a more useful organising principle than mood, and a much less flattering one.

Nine scents later, that is still the whole method.

THE WORKROOM

Four stages, two of them waiting

I
Blend
Between nine and fourteen fragrance materials are weighed to a hundredth of a gram and combined into a concentrate. This is the only stage that is quick.

II
Rest
The concentrate sits for fourteen days in a sealed steel vessel. Nothing observable happens. Skipping it produces a blend that smells thin at the top and sharp at the base.

III
Pour
Wax is brought to 62 °C and poured by hand into vessels warmed first, so the wax does not pull away from the glass as it sets. Ninety litres a batch.

IV
Cure
Poured candles cure for a further ten days before a wick is trimmed or a label goes on. A candle burned on day one smells like about seventy per cent of itself.
